Disclaimer

The context you are about to view or have already viewed is a blink of five western European cities we visited this past February. They are Amsterdam, London, Paris, Berlin, and Hanover. This issue does not encapsulate (or is it trying to) all of the cities streets and graffiti street art. It can only of course be a homage to the corners we turned down and direction we were pulled in. However, know we were night crawlers intending to unleash pounds of graffiti arsenal. The photos in this issue are a small portion of photos we shot. I will be using the rest in future issues.

Okay for those of you who have never made it out there yet, Europe is set up a little different then the United States. The governments are more for the people. For instance, they have an efficient infrastructure established for public transportation. Most people do not own a car. Instead they depend on trains, subways, buses, trams, fairies, bikes, and their feet to bolt around the city or country. Because of this graffiti writers tend to concentrate on the train lines, it is covered like wallpaper!!! Mainly, pieces and straight letters are the style. The color scheme is a bit different more pastels are used then here in the states. Bubble letters have not been embraced as much as the burners.

Grffiti in Europe seems to be more of a hobby.

This is not a dis but an observation. A writer can buy cans at flea markets and hip- hop shops. In the states the cans are under lock and key with Zero Tolerance. Societally, the citizens in most part seem to accept the graffiti. There seems to be no "HEROS" people who will snitch you out and call the authorities if they see you doing graffiti like there is here. The countries we visited had way more stickers, stencils, and poster coverage then here (with the exception of Los Angels, San Francisco, New York, and Chicago). Even in the less populated suburban areas these methods would be represented. In general the streets and cities belonged way more to the people then here in the states. The streets were alive with people until three in the mornings and remember the snow was falling.

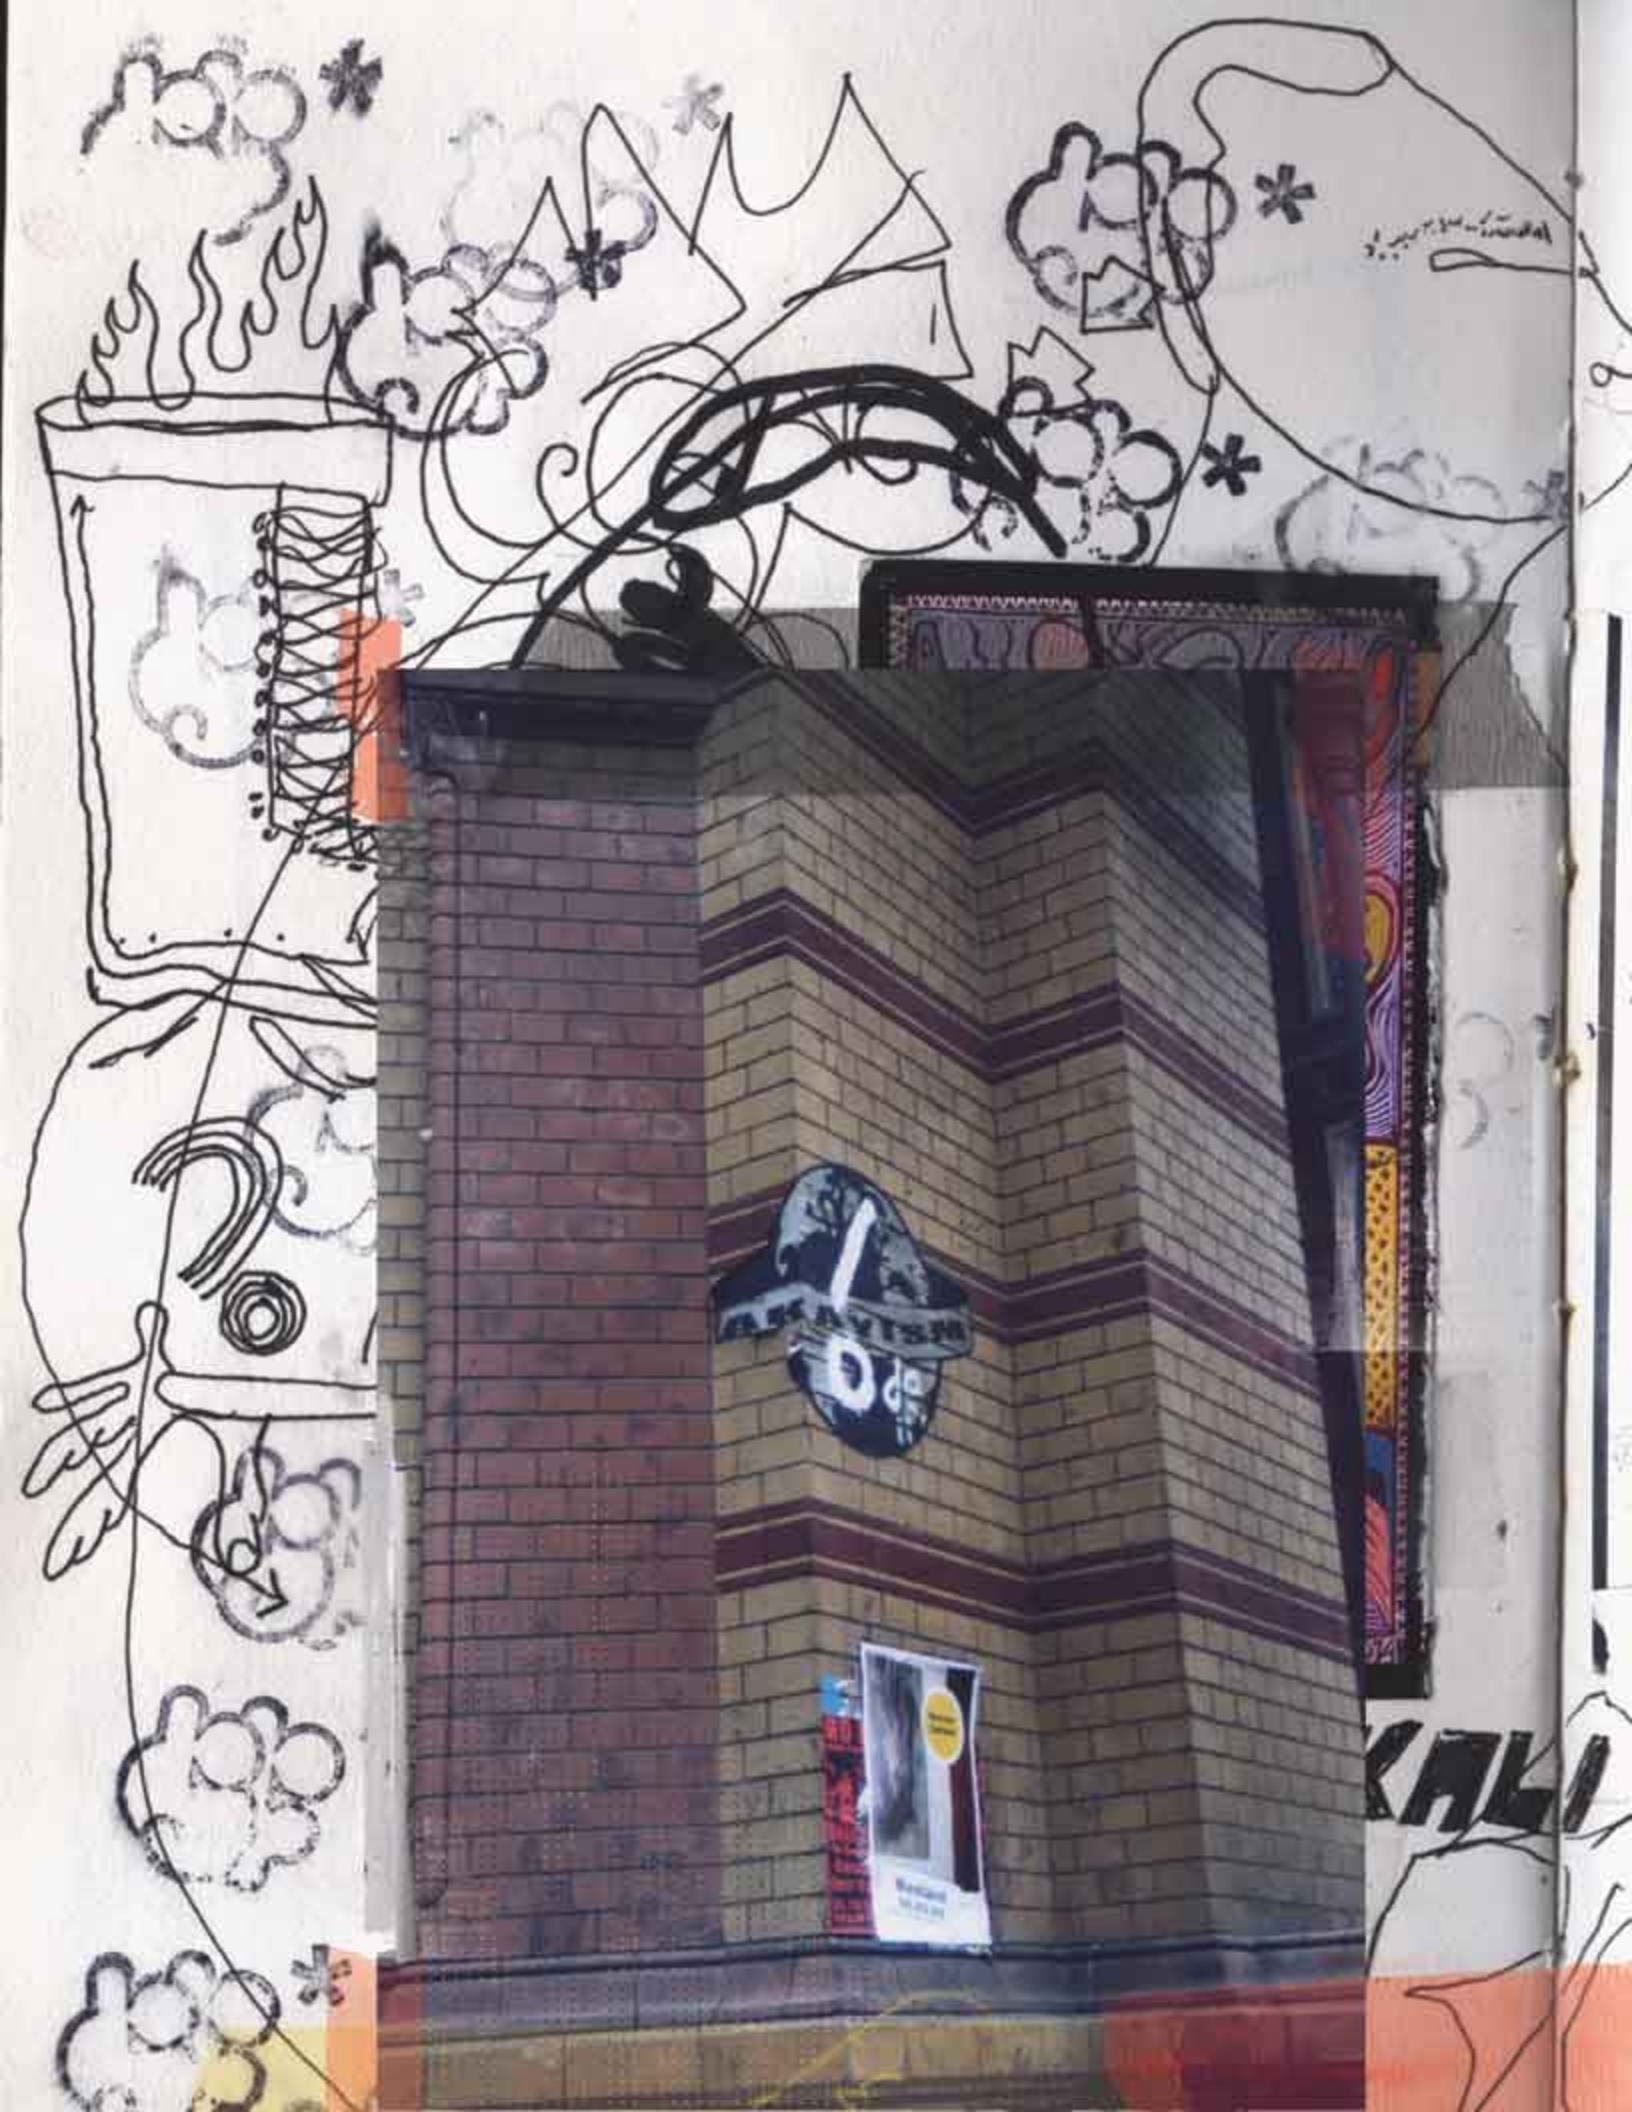

Amsterdam felt like being in San Francisco back in the day. It is like an international graffiti hub all the old school writers and the ones that are popping now are up.

East Berlin had a more local and raw style. It is truly a fascinating city. Since the wall went down 12 years ago the artists and youth have taken it over. Graffiti and art vibrates into all who walk the streets. The city is still in flux the old communist structures turning into cosmopolitan living.

Paris I am not sure about.... we walked the streets but did not go into any suburb neighborhoods so don't know. Saw a lot of stencils and stickers.

London same as Paris but has way more stickers. Both cities train lines are rocked to hell.

Train Lines in general are unbelievable - it is never-ending big ass long piece....like a rave song. A lot of the pieces are in English and U.S. slang.
